Summertime Sharing Poem By Nikki

Student Selections - Summertime Sharing. Danitra sits hunched on the stoop and pouts. I ask her what there is to pout about. "Nothin' much," she says to me, but then I see her eyes following the ice cream man. I shove my hand into my pocket. and find the change there where I left it. "Be right back," I yell, running down the street.

This simple little poem about a tattoo of a butterfly is expressing some quite complicated and contradictory feelings. "Tree" — Nikki never says what kind of tree this is, but by the end of the first stanza, you know that as the narrator leans against its trunk, she is "listening" to a Christmas tree. What else could it be with words such as "lights, tinsel, angel"?

By Nikki Giovanni. October 21, 2020. Poetry is like a child in many ways: it grows and grows adding whatever is needed: teeth, longer legs, a mind that discriminates. Or maybe its like a thorn tree: it grows but you have to be careful how you touch it or how it touches you. It can be beautiful but it can also hurt.
